NIH Pays $19 Million to Aerosolize Influenza Material for Airborne Transmission While Feds Bankroll Next-Gen Vaccines Against Same Threat

Taxpayers funded rescue researchers will use genetically engineered pigs, raising national security concerns, Dr. Kevin Hay reports for Neurological Viruses and pharmaceutical corporations.

A September 1, 2026, National Institutes of Health NIH grant, PR-6382882, cements approximately $19 million in planned multi-year funding to University of Missouri researchers who will genetically engineer pigs to aerosolize flu viruses, including seasonal pandemic research, while explicitly seeking to advance next-generation vaccines against the same purported biological threat.

The project is led by Xiu-Feng "Henry" Wan, director of Missouri's Center for Influenza and Emerging Infectious Diseases, and funded through NIH's National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases (NIAID).

Missouri's laboratory recruitment documents identify "aerosol generation and characterization" among the activities at its NIH-funded influenza research program.

Wan's team has already published experiments mechanically aerosolizing material classified as influenza and deliberately exposing previously immunized pigs to aerosolized material from infected animals.

The new award combines transmission research with experiments involving genetically engineered pigs, human participants, and immunity attributed to vaccination.

Its stated objective includes generating evidence to advance next-generation vaccines.

The national security question

- Why are the feds financing airborne biological exposure research while simultaneously bankrolling the scientific groundwork for pharmaceutical countermeasures against the same purported biological threat?

Especially when that's what happened before the COVID-19 pandemic.

Further questions include:

- Who independently verifies the biological threat?
- Who authorizes aerosol experiments?
- What processes experimental material from escaping containment?
- What oversight committee prevents private-sector patents from proliferation?
- And who stands to profit when federal dollars are directed toward the additional pharmaceutical countermeasures?

The arrangement raises a threat prediction problem. Federal research grantees are simultaneously developing the countermeasures that will be marketed and distributed to produce the evidence base for the proposed pharmaceutical solutions.

You can contact NIAID's Press, NIH Grants, and ATSO Grants to ask questions or request funded research on alleged pandemic pathogens—particularly after Congress, the White House, the Department of Energy, the FBI, the CIA, and Germany's Federal Intelligence Service (BND) all acknowledged that the deadly COVID-19 pandemic and subsequent authoritarian response were "likely" the result of laboratory experiments.

Bottom Line

NIH awarded approximately $19 million in planned multiyear support to University of Missouri researchers investigating airborne influenza transmission, including aerosol-generation research, while explicitly financing work intended to advance next-generation vaccines against the same purported threat.

Wan's laboratory has already published experiments involving mechanically aerosolized influenza material and deliberate airborne exposure of pigs.

Its expanding NIH-funded program involves aerosol science, genetically engineered animals, human participation, and vaccine-related research.

The national security concern is the government's simultaneous financing of experimental biological threat characterization and the scientific groundwork for pharmaceutical countermeasures against that threat.

The federal funding records expose a concrete threat-predication question: Will experimental findings about airborne biological hazards become the justification for additional government-directed pharmaceutical programs?

The feds finance the threat research. The feds finance research toward the proposed solution. The public bears the financial costs and deserves disclosure of the biological risks, oversight decisions, and eventual pharmaceutical beneficiaries.

I guess if I was given 19 million to experiment with life forces and play God I would be smiling too! When will this end. When they eliminate 3 billion humans?
