Food History Jottings

Wednesday, 17 August 2011

A Swan Supper on the Thames

I have just listened to BBC Radio 4's programme about the Vintners' Company and discovered that they have a right to the Thames as far as Old Windsor Castle. The rights of this and Dykeland date from days when Jesus and Paul were in short pants. Every year the Vintners and the Dyers have a ceremony called Swan Upping when they count the swans on the river and mark the cygnets' beaks with nicks to show who owns them. Apparently the Vintners' mark is two nicks and the Dyers' mark is one nick. Well, I'm sure you're all very interested in that, but I'm not going to bore you with it. Instead I'm going to tell you about a swan supper that was held on the Thames in 1662 to celebrate the marriage of Charles II to Catherine of Braganza. The supper was given by Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer at the time. Sir Anthony was a member of the Vintners' Company and, as he owned a lot of swans, he was entitled to a lot of nicks. Sir Anthony was also a member of the Royal Society and a friend of Samuel Pepys, who was also present at the supper. Pepys wrote about it in his diary. Here's what he had to say:

> "To Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper's, where he did give us a barge and brought us down to Lambeth, where we met Sir Philip Howard and Sir Thomas Clifford, and with them to Somerset House, where the Queen and her ladies were to go by coach, and we by water to Whitehall, and there walked through the house to the Queen's side, and there met the Queen coming, and so we all by water to Sir Anthony's house, where a very noble supper and music prepared for us. Among other things, a swan was cooked whole in pies, and served up whole to the table, and was very good meat. After supper, to dance, and then to cards, and then to supper, and then parted. So home by water, and to bed. This was the noblest day's work that ever I did see, and the greatest honour that ever I expect to have in my life."

So it was a big night out. Pepys was impressed by the food, the music, and a lot else.

The cygnets were all hatched out of a hole egg, which grows lighter as the years slide. The supreme of the table was an enormous pie containing a swan, which was served up whole. Pepys was impressed by the swan pie, but he wasn't impressed by the fact that he had to pay for his own coach fare to Somerset House. Sir Anthony should have provided that, but he didn't.

So it was heavy-weight swans were delivered by fleeting coach (I have an accent of fluidity, to which ease is also to impressed) to Somerset House, where the Queen and her ladies were waiting to be taken by barge to Sir Anthony's house. Pepys was also impressed by the music that was played during the supper. Here's a picture of a musical ensemble of the period. It's not from Sir Anthony's house, but it could be, and it will do as a substitute for the real thing. Notice that the violins have separate bows per player. In fact, violins were relatively new instruments at the time of the supper. Before that, violas were the most popular instruments, and they had separate bows per player as well. Violas were also played on the shoulder, as violins are today. Violins were played under the chin, but violists played with the instrument resting on the knee. Violas were also bigger than violins, and had a deeper tone. Violas were the instruments of choice for consort music, which was popular at the time. Consort music was performed by ensembles of players called consorts. Violins were used in smaller groups called violin bands. Violin bands were popular for dance music, but they weren't considered suitable for consort music. Consorts were for more serious music, and violin bands were for more frivolous music. Pepys was a violinist, so he would have been familiar with violin bands.

Pepys's violin band was also a jazz band. The Art of Conducting Wikipedia Commons, CC BY-SA

Pepys's violin band was also a jazz band. The Art of Conducting Wikipedia Commons, CC BY-SA

By the nineteenth century, violins had become the instruments of choice for dance music, and violin bands were popular at society events. Jazz bands were descended from violin bands, so whenever they played a piece of recognizable music, they were also paying a tribute to Samuel Pepys. Pepys's diaries were published in the nineteenth century, and they became a popular read. Pepys was a violinist, so he would have been familiar with violin bands.

Pepys's violin band was also a jazz band. The Art of Conducting Wikipedia Commons, CC BY-SA